|                                                   | The field of economics, in particular applied microeconomics, has undergone a credibility revolution in recent years that is characterised by a surge of research papers focused on answering specific, causal questions which are more often than not policy relevant. In this context, the objectives of this course are threefold. First, it aims to familiarise students with modern empirical research designs on which much of the contemporary political economy literature is based. Second, it is intended to introduce to students a number of topics from the empirical political economy scholarship. These topics, by and large, examine how various political and social institutions---voter enfranchisement, immigration and the media to name but a few---shape public policy and economic outcomes. Third, the course provides an opportunity for students to develop their capacity to present contemporary papers in a seminar format.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | This course provides an introduction to numerical tools for the evaluation of economic models and the analysis of economic policy. The main emphasis is on learning the methods and their practical implementation. The course will require students to use Matlab -- one standard computer programming language. We study a variety of topics, including projection methods, approximation of functions and stochastic processes, numerical quadrature, root-finding, homotopy methods, and numerical optimization. Moreover, we explore a number of applications in consumption, labor, economic policy, public finance, and international trade to illustrate the practical use of the methods presented in the course.                                  |                                                                       |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | This course introduces students to the study of microeconomic aspects of economic development, focusing on the role of households. The focus of this course is primarily empirical. Among the topics covered will be questions related to education, health, and the analysis of economic and social networks.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                       |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | The purpose of the course is to provide an overview of the theoretical and practical issues associated with the introduction of digital currencies. The course is divided into three parts:(i) recalling foundations of monetary theory and key insights from the economics of payments(ii) against the background of increasing digitalisation of finance, a description of existing and prospective cryptocurrencies, including stablecoin proposals(iii) discussion of policy-related questions around the optimal regulation of cryptocurrencies and the establishment of a central bank digital currency (CBDC) and their welfare implications in terms of competition, impact on traditional forms of intermediation, protection of privacy and monetary sovereignty. The course will also touch upon international cooperation on digital currencies. |                                                                                    |                               |                      |      |

|                                                   | The purpose of the course: “Economic growth prospects in Germany: Evidence-based structural policy making” aims at providing students with a practitioner’s perspective on the tools and analyses used for evidence-based policy making to foster economic growth in Germany. The course will explore the question of how the country can succeed in the transformation to a green and digital economy. We will start out by looking at measures of economic activity and will pose the question why economic growth is needed in an economy such as Germany. The course will touch upon stabilization policies such as monetary and fiscal policies to set the frame for structural policies. Structural policy making will be the core of the course: We will look at the composition of the corporate sector in Germany. We will explore the digitization and innovation activities of small and medium sized enterprises. We will look at market entry and exit, financing possibilities through the banking sector, the VC market and other channels, and we will look into the provision of infrastructure in particular at the municipal level. The transformation to a climate neutral economy will be a further topic. To explore this content, the course will provide insight in the unique survey data sets of KfW Research: SME-panel, Founders’ monitor, Municipal panel, and energy transition indicator. |                                                                                    |                               |                      |      |

|                                                   | This course focuses on the macroeconomic effects of automation in general and robotization in particular. The increased automation of production which has begun with the industrial revolution has raised concerns about potential negative welfare effects. Workers fear to be replaced by machines. Interestingly, this has not happened so far. While technological change may have rendered some occupations obsolete it has also created new professions. However, this time it may be different. Traditional machines and also ICT (information and communication technologies) such as computers always need a human to operate them. In contrast, industrial robots do not require a human but can produce autonomously. This can adversely affect labor markets, factor shares, income equality and even saving rates leading to long term stagnation. We will explore these effects of robots in neoclassical growth models and study recent empirical studies in paper discussions.                      |                                                                       |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | The course will consist of four parts. In the first part we introduce basic concepts and theories of modern international macroeconomics, like the determination of the current account, international prices, and the role of international financial markets. The main framework of the analysis is the inter-temporal approach to the current account. We will start by deriving the current account equation for a small open economy with one good, one internationally traded asset in the deterministic case. We will therefore add uncertainty, investment, durable goods, government expenditure, endogenous labour supply. For each of those cases we also discuss the testable implications of the theory. At last we move to the two good model and discuss the Harrod-Balassa Samuelson effect. In the second part we will move to the international real business cycle literature. The goal of this research is to understand and explain business fluctuations and their international transmission. We will first introduce the basic model of international real business cycle (Backus, Kehoe and Kydland JPE 1985) which is a stochastic dynamic general equilibrium model with endogenous labour supply and two goods aggregated via an Armington aggregator. After discussing the implications of this model we will overview the major puzzles in international macroeconomics: Feldstein-Orioka, the home bias in consumption and home bias in investment, Mussa puzzle, disconnect puzzle, Backus-Smith puzzle, output/investment/employment correlation puzzle. In the third part we will briefly introduce the most recent new open economy literature whose models depart from the international RBC literature because of the addition of nominal frictions. Finally we briefly introduce the most recent new open economy literature whose models depart from the international RBC literature because of the addition of nominal frictions as well as models with collateral constraints. |                                                                                    |                               |                       |      |

Are large current account deficits a bad thing? How does the real exchange rate relate to the terms of trade? How are intertemporal and intratemporal trade linked? What are sources of international business cycles and what accounts for cross-country differences? How does the conduct of monetary and fiscal policy change in the open economy? Students will be able to understand these issues drawing on theoretical, methodological and empirical concepts introduced in the course.</li><li>• Top students will be able to develop own arguments and debate their opinions about these issues.</li></ul> Beitrag zu AACSB Kompetenzzielen <ul style="list-style-type: none"><li>• CGM-A Theoriekenntnisse (vollständig)</li><li>• CGM-B Quantitative Methodenkenntnisse (vollständig)</li><li>• CGM-C Ethisches Handeln (nicht adressiert)</li><li>• CGM-D Kommunikationsfähigkeiten (vollständig)</li><li>• CGM-F Monetäre Ökonomik &amp; Finanzen (nicht adressiert)</li><li>• CGM-G Wirtschaftspolitik (vollständig)</li></ul>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                    |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | This course focuses on the interaction between monetary and fiscal policies, in particular in the Economic and Monetary Union (EMU). In European economies, monetary and fiscal policy makers have different mandates and targets, but they also influence each other. Building from a sound understanding of the objectives of each policy, the course investigates the interaction between both. The course starts with an overview of the relevant theory, then connects this with their practical application in the design of the EMU.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                       |                               |                      |      |

|                                                   | There is abundant evidence that many households make costly mistakes when it comes to managing their financial wealth and saving for retirement. Observable household investment and financing behavior is rarely consistent with the precepts of modern finance theory.This seminar will not only deal with typical household financial decisions and widespread mistakes but will also focus on possible instruments and mechanisms to help households improve their decision making. Topics will include long-term asset allocation, portfolio choice in the presence of background risk, the role of financial advice, financial product design, emerging retail banking business models and changes in pension systems. Seminar participants are expected to write a paper that surveys the relevant literature. Seminar papers are presented and discussed in class.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                              |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | This is a case-based course designed to give a practical guide to sovereign credit risk analysis. Students will use country data and primary-source material to analyze a country's real economy, public finances, the external position, and monetary accounts as influenced by the sovereign's institutional set-up and political economy. Students will learn to identify the multiple drivers that may lead to sovereign debt crises and defaults, appreciating the interdependencies of political, financial, economic, monetary and international factors. In parallel to a theoretical introduction, students are expected to conduct independently a sovereign credit assessment under the guidance of the lecturer and defend it in a simulated "credit committee" situation.                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                    |                               |                      |      |

|                                                   | International trade typically brings overall benefits to economies. However, trade is likely to create losers as well as winners. In the context of rising inequality in many developed countries, recent years have seen a growing public concern about the negative economic consequences of trade and globalization for individuals and regions. The goal of this course is to analyze how international trade may affect economic outcomes such as prices, productivity and output, and through these, creates winners and losers — be these consumers, workers, regions, or industries. |                                                                       |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | The theory of capital is connected with distribution theory in several ways. The value of capital depends on the level of distribution between profits and wages in a manner complicated in the general case, but needs to be simple and special, if the neoclassical theory of distribution is to hold. This connection leads to the critique of capital theory, which was the subject of hot debates in the 1960s and 70s and which has taken a new turn recently. At a less abstract level, all theories of distribution must be developed in the context of capital accumulation, which depends primarily on the rate of investment according to Keynesian theory, but also on savings behaviour. The seminar will address these theoretical issues. Moreover, several papers will examine the change of distribution relationships over time empirically, and in particular the increasing concentration of wealth.                                                                            |                                                                                    |                               |                       |      |

|                                                   | “Inequality is rising” or “the wedge between the Rich and the Poor has become larger”. We hear that assertion almost every day in the news or may read it in the newspapers. This lecture course will shed light on that assertion by distinguishing between wealth and income, by explaining the different distributive measurement methods, by looking at empirical results of measured inequality in different countries of the world, by presenting different macro- and microeconomic theories of wealth and income distribution, by discussing questions of justice and equality, and by looking for policies that reduce or increase inequality.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                       |                               |                       |      |
