Juncture: Dialogues on Inclusive Capitalism
Business Journalist in Residence Programme

Objective:

The Juncture Journalist in Residence Programme provides an opportunity for a journalist to connect with business scholars to enhance their journalism.

The journalist can build relationships with researchers and deepen their technical knowledge without the pressure of daily business deadlines. With the journalist gaining an insight into how academic research works, the initiative aims to improve media coverage of business research and enhance knowledge transfer between academia and society.

The programme is hosted and supported by Juncture: Dialogues on Inclusive Capitalism, a Faculty Research Centre at the University of Auckland Business School.

Programme structure:

The programme is targeted at experienced freelance and staff business journalists with several years of work experience. Those with an interest in deepening their knowledge and understanding of business and economics are encouraged to apply. Initially, there will be one placement per year.

Activities:

The participant will spend three to six months (exact duration agreed on a case-by-case basis) based at the University of Auckland Business School in the Sir Owen G. Glenn Building, networking and building relationships with Juncture and Business School scholars, participating in and attending Juncture and Business School events and activities.

During their residency, the journalist will participate in various activities. These may include:

- 1. Mutual exchange with researchers: Engage in informal and formal conversations with Business School and Juncture scholars to explore emerging topics, trends and academic approaches in business and economics.
- 2. Research and development of projects: Explore, investigate, and write stories/articles on topics of interest to the journalist relevant to business, potentially begin work on a series or long-form project. Residents would be encouraged to pitch articles to media publications, and/or these may be published on Juncture and University websites.

3. Participation in Juncture and Business School events: Attend workshops, seminars, roundtables and public talks to stay informed of current debates and research agendas.

5. Collaboration on research translation projects (optional): Explore ways to help academics reframe or communicate research for broader audiences, without a requirement to publish.

NB The programme is expressly intended to promote journalism and enhance the resident's knowledge of business and economic research. There is no expectation that the participating journalist will report on the Business School or Juncture's research activities.

Programme format

The programme format is designed to fit around existing commitments. It is expected that participants will spend 2-3 days per week for up to a six-month period based at the University of Auckland Business School. The exact duration of the programme will be agreed upon following a discussion with the successful candidate.

Remuneration

The programme includes a salary between $100,000 - $120,000 per annum for a full-time role (pro-rated for the contract period agreed) and access to the use of the University's library and online resources.

How to apply

If you would like to discuss the role or find out more about Juncture, please contact us to make an appointment.

Applications should be submitted via email to Juncture by 15 September.

Applicants should include:

- A short CV (maximum 2 pages) including links to examples of your work
- A document of no more than two pages, clearly outlining your experience relevant to the residency
- What you would hope to achieve during the residency should you be appointed. This may also reflect your thoughts on the challenges of the residency and/or what it might make possible.
- An indication of preferred duration of programme (between 3 – 6 months).

The University is committed to providing a flexible working environment.
